

The Federal Communications Commission(FCC) is considering a proposal that would diminish the protections received from Indiana's Telephone Privacy law, and preempting the State of Indiana's Telephone Privacy laws in favor of adopting one lower national standard.

I would like to state that prior to being on Indiana's "No-call" list, I was receiving numerous calls daily and my caller ID was full of telephone numbers of vendors and companies that had called my home during work hours. Daily I had to clear my caller ID of these many telephone numbers and still be bothered in the evening by these companies. Since signing up for this "no-call" list, the amount of calls have been reduced to maybe one a week. I think the Indiana Telephone Privacy laws have accomplished what it was intended to accomplish and I would hate to start getting all these calls again. Please reconsider implementing any proposal that would lessen Indiana's Telephone Privacy law protections. I would not mind a national standard, but not a lower one than is currently in existence in Indiana.
